

THE HERITAGE LECTURES

447

Making Sense of Jewish Liberalism

By Don Feder

The Heritage Foundation was established in 1973 as a non-partisan, tax-exempt policy research institute dedicated to the principles of free competitive enterprise, limited government, individual liberty, and a strong national defense. The Foundation's research and study programs are designed to make the voices of responsible conservatism heard in Washington, D.C., throughout the United States, and in the capitals of the world.

Heritage publishes its research in a variety of formats for the benefit of policy makers; the communications media; the academic, business, and financial communities; and the public at large. Over the past five years alone The Heritage Foundation has published some 1,500 books, monographs, and studies, ranging in size from the 927-page government blueprint, Mandate for Leadership III: Policy Strategies for the 1990s, to the more frequent "Critical Issues" monographs and the topical "Backgrounders," "Issue Bulletins," and "Talking Points" papers. Heritage's other regular publications include the Business/Education Insider, Mexico Watch, and Policy Review, a quarterly journal of analysis and opinion.

In addition to the printed word, Heritage regularly brings together national and international opinion leaders and policy makers to discuss issues and ideas in a continuing series of seminars, lectures, debates, briefings, and conferences.

Heritage is classified as a Section 501(c)(3) organization under the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, and is recognized as a publicly supported organization described in Section 509(a)(1) and 170(b)(1)(A)(vi) of the Code. Individuals, corporations, companies, associations, and foundations are eligible to support the work of The Heritage Foundation through tax-deductible gifts.

Note: Nothing written here is to be construed as necessarily reflecting the views of The Heritage Foundation or as an attempt to aid or hinder the passage of any bill before Congress.

The Heritage Foundation
214 Massachusetts Avenue, N.E.
Washington, D.C. 20002-4999
U.S.A.
202/546-4400

Making Sense of Jewish Liberalism

By Don Feder

Periodically, someone on the right—usually a neo-conservative—will address the anomaly of Jewish liberalism, noting that the politics of the Jewish community undermines the manifest self-interest of American Jewry. Said pundit will confidently predict that it is only a matter of time before Jews come to their senses and begin voting for conservative candidates and supporting conservative causes.

As an ardent conservative and a deeply committed Jew, whose conservatism is a natural outgrowth of his Judaism, I wish I could bring you such a comforting message. I can't. It ain't gonna happen, at least not in the foreseeable future.

As I noted in a recent column, shrimp will learn to whistle "Hava Nigilah" before American Jews escape the liberal ghetto. However, there may be some small satisfaction in learning how this lamentable state of affairs came about, and discovering that for the malady of Jewish liberalism there most assuredly is a cure.

At the outset, perhaps we should ask: Just how liberal is the Jewish community? Shall we say, exceedingly? Shall we say, devoutly? It's a cliché that is nonetheless true that Jews have the incomes of Episcopalians and vote like Puerto Ricans.

Ruth Wisse, professor of Yiddish literature at Harvard, writes: "Jews are associated with liberalism the way the French are associated with wine: It is considered native to their region." Excepting blacks, Jews are the most liberal demographic group in the population.

The "Jewish" Vote. The 1988 election was, in this regard, typical. As the Democratic presidential nominee, Michael Dukakis received 70 percent of the Jewish vote. Jewish support for Dukakis exceeded his vote among the unemployed (66 percent), union households (64 percent), Hispanics (66 percent), and even his fellow Greeks (55 percent).

Jews overwhelmingly endorsed the Massachusetts governor despite the fact that the Republican national platform opposed the creation of a Palestinian state, denounced anti-Semitism, and called for rescission of the U.N. resolution equating Zionism with racism, while the Democrats were conspicuously silent on all of the above. Even the governor's warm embrace of Jesse Jackson (considered an anti-Semite by a majority of Jewish respondents to an opinion survey that year) did not keep Jews out of the Democratic column.

The 1988 election was part of a trend lasting more than half a century. Over ten presidential elections from 1932 to 1976, the average Jewish vote for Republican presidential candidates was an anemic 28 percent. The only blip on the graph came in 1980, when Ronald Reagan won nearly 40 percent of the Jewish vote. By 1984 Jewish political normalcy had reasserted itself. In his reelection bid, Reagan swept 49 states and got less than one out of three Jewish votes.

Far from an election-year phenomenon, Jewish liberalism is a day-in, day-out love affair. According to a 1988 Los Angeles Times survey, 41 percent of Jews consider themselves liberal; only 17 percent are self-described conservatives. This is almost exactly the reverse of political identification

---

Don Feder is a syndicated columnist and author of A Jewish Conservative Looks at Pagan America.

He spoke at The Heritage Foundation on February 19, 1993.

ISSN 0272-1155 © 1993 by The Heritage Foundation

among the general population, where 18 percent choose the liberal label and 30 percent call themselves conservatives.

On issue after issue, American Jews pledge allegiance to the liberal agenda. Among Jewish groups, support for so-called abortion rights reads like a directory of community organizations. The Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights tries to cast an aura of sanctity over feticide on demand. Of the 35 constituent organizations listed on its letterhead, fully one-third are Jewish, including the American Jewish Congress, American Jewish Committee, National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods, Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and Women's League for Conservative Judaism.

By a margin of nine to one, Jews endorse homosexual rights. Alfred H. Moses, president of the American Jewish Committee, enthusiastically enunciates the organization's support for ending the ban on gays in the military, which he describes as essential to the achievement of "full justice and equality in the United States."

How delighted Moshe Rabbeneau (Moses our teacher) would have been to know that three millennia after he gave humanity the law which bears his name—a code that includes the strongest possible injunctions against sodomy—another Moses would promulgate a new Torah where minority status is bestowed on the basis of sexual behavior, and where fidelity to the original Law of Moses is the equivalent of racial/religious bigotry.

Whether it's feminism, day care, defense cuts, opposition to school prayer, or First Amendment fanaticism—with certain honorable exceptions (the Orthodox, in particular), the Jewish community marches in liberal lockstep. Indeed, American Jews are fervent proselytizers for every "ism"—feminism, environmentalism, pacifism, redistributionism—save Judaism.

It's not just that Jews can't distinguish their political friends from their enemies, or that Jews consistently promote non-Jewish values. Far worse, this reflex liberalism compels them to take positions adverse to their best interests.

Let us digress a moment to consider just three of these cases, where the politics of the community borders on the suicidal.

School Choice

In a 1987 poll, Jews opposed tuition tax credits by a two-to-one margin. In 1986, a ballot question in Massachusetts would have amended our state constitution to allow such limited governmental aid to private schools as textbooks, a type of state support held constitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court. The measure was defeated, due in part to the opposition of Jewish organizations—which raised the dreaded specter of an erosion of the wall between church and state.

It is no secret that intermarriage and assimilation are major problems for American Jewry—task forces are commissioned to study the crisis, conferences are convened to debate solutions. In some areas, the rate of intermarriage approaches 60 percent.

By and large, non-Jewish spouses do not convert to Judaism. The children of mixed marriages generally are not raised as Jews. In most cases, they and their descendants are irredeemably lost to the spiritual nation of Israel.

Combined with a declining Jewish birth rate, this has made us the incredible shrinking people. While the general population grew 22 percent between 1970 and 1990, Jewish demographic growth was an insignificant 1.8 percent. As a component of the overall population, Jews declined from 2.7 percent to 2.2 percent during that period.

Jewish education is by far the best answer to this tragedy. Graduates of Jewish day schools rarely intermarry. Their levels of observance and commitment are extremely high.

There are now more than 500 Jewish day schools nationwide, thanks in large part to the Orthodox and the Lubavitch Hasidic movement. Most struggle to survive. Their teachers are underpaid, their facilities inadequate. The parents of day school children bear a double burden—the taxes they pay to maintain the public school establishment and the tuition to educate their children. Many more would opt for the day school alternative, if they could afford it.

If Jewish leaders had any sort of survival instinct, they would be leading the charge for public aid to private education. Instead they're in the forefront of opposition. Tuition tax credits and vouchers would "entangle the government with religion in a way Jews find unhealthy," a Jewish leader piously proclaimed. Three of my children attend the Yeshiva Academy in Worcester, Massachusetts. God forbid the Commonwealth should give them school books—which would lead directly to pogroms, another edition of the Spanish Inquisition, and the installation of Pat Robertson as Archbishop of the Church of America, we are told.

Defense

In 1990, Saddam Hussein represented the greatest threat to Israel in our generation. The aptly named Butcher of Baghdad was a Hitler clone with the strongest army in the Middle East, who had sworn to annihilate the Jewish state. Moreover, here was an international gangster who had swallowed a sovereign state, who was clearly on the march—a calculating madman on the threshold of acquiring a nuclear capability.

In light of the foregoing, Jewish organizations abandoned their historic pacifism. The Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations endorsed the Bush approach to removing Saddam from Kuwait. Henry Siegman, of the American Jewish Congress, supported the use of military force. Even such inveterate Jewish doves as Representatives Mel Levine, Stephen Solarz, and Tom Lantos voted for the resolution to authorize force in the Persian Gulf. On the other hand, it must be noted that such celebrated kneejerks at Barbara Boxer and Barney Frank were unable to see beyond their ideological blinders, even when the fate of Israel was at stake.

Throughout the Reagan years, those Jewish organizations and leaders who lined up behind Desert Storm had invariably and habitually supported the defense cuts which would have made the operation impossible. For instance, in 1984, some 60 percent of Jews surveyed agreed that "U.S. military spending should be cut" and then illogically added that this nation should continue "to be a reliable supplier of Israel" and "maintain a strong military capacity." Commenting on this glaring contradiction, Milton Himmelfarb, writing in Commentary, quotes the Duke of Wellington to a man who addressed him as "Mr. Jones, I believe." Said the Duke: "If you believe that, you can believe anything."

Well, the Jewish community breathed a great sigh of relief when Saddam was driven from Kuwait, his army decimated, and then—this past November—turned around and rewarded the party whose congressional delegation overwhelmingly opposed the war to stop Iraq. If there is any logic in this, it will take a keener observer than I to discern it.

By the way, this is not the first time that Jewish survival has taken a backseat to Jewish politics. In the mid-1980s, when the Evil Empire was still a going concern, 52 percent of Jewish respondents to an opinion survey said Soviet human rights abuses should not impede progress toward arms control. This at a time when Jews were the most persecuted minority in the Soviet Union, and Moscow had replaced Berlin as the worldwide center of anti-Semitic agitation.

Black Anti-Semitism

Opinion polls show that blacks are twice as likely as whites to hold negative views about Jews. This hostility is manifested in various ways.

Organizations like the Nation of Islam and rap groups like NWA reach millions with messages of hatred. According to The New Republic, at a 1990 conference on African-American education in Atlanta, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion were openly displayed. The most recent issue of the Weisenthal Center's newsletter reports on a November speech at Columbia University, sponsored by the school's Black Students Organization, which amounted to a mini-Nuremberg revival.

According to observers, the speaker, one Khalid Mohammed, spent two hours denigrating Jews and Judaism, charging that Jews were responsible for the slave trade, practiced a "dirty religion," and had long conspired to oppress blacks.

In his new book, Inside American Education, black sociologist Thomas Sowell relates similar episodes on dozens of campuses. According to the author, other speakers invited to address black groups at various schools have made such comments as: the Jews are a "violent people," the "best Zionist is a dead Zionist," or have referred to "Columbia Jewniversity in Jew York City." Not since the days of Father Coughlin has anti-Semitism reached such a wide audience.

The Anti-Defamation League's 1992 Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents, released earlier this month, notes that since 1988 the number of anti-Semitic incidents on college campuses has more than doubled. It attributes this in part to "the disturbing fact that many Black student leaders and representatives—in effect, a significant portion of the future leadership of the Black community—repeatedly and enthusiastically support speakers who are well known for their Jew-baiting."

It's just an intellectual stone's throw from the Columbia campus to the Crown Heights section of Brooklyn. In August and September 1991, that heavily Hasidic area witnessed the worst anti-Semitic violence in this nation since the lynching of Leo Frank. Following the death of a black child in an auto accident, mobs of black teenagers went on a three-day rampage reminiscent of Czarist pogroms. To shouts of "Heil Hitler" and "Kill the Jews," Jewish stores were vandalized, Jewish homes stoned, and Jews beaten in the streets. Yankel Rosenbaum, a 29-year-old Hasidic scholar, was dragged from his car and knifed to death for no other reason than his Jewishness.

Main-line Jewish organizations were literally paralyzed. Groups which could issue a press release denouncing skinhead graffiti in a matter of minutes, took a week or longer to condemn these atrocities. The horror so contradicted their world view—where Jews support "oppressed minorities" and the recipients of that beneficence naturally appreciate their benefactors—that they were psychologically unable to respond.

For some, the response can only be described as bizarre, self-loathing, but entirely consistent with liberal dogma. In December, the American Jewish Congress ran an ad in The New York Times defending Mayor David Dinkins (who restrained the police for 72 crucial hours) from charges of anti-Semitism. The group also touted its recent alliance with Jesse Jackson, to push a broad range of welfare state issues, as an example of constructive Jewish-black engagement.

Consider the words of David Saperstein, director of the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism. Among the solutions he offers for Jewish-black tensions is "Economic Justice." Saperstein writes: "Economic distress leads to bitterness and despair, which in turn lead to resentment and hatred. Where economic opportunity thrives, the divisive words of cynical demagogues—black and Jew—fall on deaf ears." How unique. How totally out-of-character for a liberal to fall back on economic determinism as an explanation for malice and envy, instead of admitting the possibility that human nature is flawed.

